Her Catching Eyes

Bright

Swoop

1.

Drunk?

No, I wasn't really drunk:
a single pint, an unfed mind, made the world sparkle
just a bit.

The Theatre?

Yes, I'd mentioned Shakespeare:
you know, the usual
"would she be interested?":
a corner in an email.

See her there?

No, I hadn't expected to see her,
it was her day off.
Mind you,
I'm often there,
that time.

I had to ask.

I didn't get the choice,
I just watched myself, engaging.

In a week.

It was fully booked.
You're right:
it seems a century.

Yes,

all the usual clichés,
but for me,
right now,
those clichés live.

2.

Swung:
my mood has swung
to heavy-eyed unhappiness.

Once we've seen the play
"she'll stay with an old friend":

not to let the chance
of us establishing.

And, so foolishly,
I said some words of hope,
just once, elsewhere.

Now chatterers,
they swoop this privacy and incomprehend so perfectly they could be the pissing-in-the-wind parents of a children's film.

I fear their rumours spread like hay fever
on a summer breeze.

I'll call her,
hear if—
just hear.

3.

I was stupid in shock.

Her girlish giggles,
her “hold me, kiss me, fuck me” giggles:
I am a serial fool.

Her voice turned away
as I exhaled stupidity.

4.

The night was darkening.

He said to me,
"She's my girlfriend,
look after her,
she's scared of walking home alone, walk with her".

With these words,
my madness flew.

So I walked with her,
and she talked,
she talked a never-ending harmony of fear.

And there was something of these darkening streets, something of the light
too weak to illuminate where my footstep rang, illuminating nothing.

And this darkening infection, it was invading me,
it was riding on her voice's chattering fear.

And I rode as though my undefended self,
a reeling self, looked up, and saw the claws of madness dive,
a dive to snatch existence, as we walked along the darkening.

I fought,
for an hour,
I fought.
I gave my sex
to stay.

And had I lost,
had I fought the easy fight,
who would I be?

5.

She might have said:

“I do so love these fireworks, sparkles of bright moment,
an insistence in the sky, flowering.

Then the pub,
friends,
the usual walk home.

And a familiar stranger passes on,
his eyes clutch madness as though it were an overcoat in a bitter wind.

We slow,
we gather time around us.

Then, in a luminous dark on the edge of lamp-post light, a something on the ground breathes.

It is that madman,
a man collapsed,
shivering in the summer night.

And his eyes open anger, and the street light
loses the power to form.

And it seems to me
he has a need to strike his agony out, to find its poisoning heart, but that dark agony, devious, telescopes his sight away to those who flaunt existence, coincidence.

And I know
as a bigot dare not look inside himself to see his source of death, so a madman, insane, cannot.

So he attacks when his agony tolls, and his agony tolls at us.

And in this tidal darkness I hear him howl his agony howl, a migraine howl, and my instinct grips my reason dead, and I run.

But his howls retreat beyond the distance to someone else's problem, and I relax,
and I, alone,
I let my pride
walk me slowly home.”

And this is what she might have said, but she won't.

The bastard,
he:
me,
I had a knife.

Home Town

The evening fog glows headlight rushing white in serene yellow streetlight.

Ice forms.

The town,
yet knowing of traffic, does not hear a between-lorry silence fill, like a continuity error, with the engine down of a slowing car, turning, sloping, stopping at an ordinary motel.

A cat that doesn't care cosies in a window
of homely light,
watching the movement.

No dog barks its unnecessary warning.

Even the wind is still.

The visitor,
leaving his fussing car,
walks to the motel door.

Thin,
thirty or forty,
straight black hair,
a tidy working suit,
a familiar coat,

he has the stride of tired confidence, the caution of strange surroundings.

Inside this mock–welcoming place, he shares mock jokes,
and makes mock laughter,
and buys his night’s mock home.

He walks austere white corridors on cold grey carpet and retreats beyond a mock–locked door.

He can’t relax;
he can’t watch those television programmes so familiar elsewhere,

so routine decides
to wash and bathe,
dry and shave,
brush and comb,
and sleep an early night.

*Its great to have a coo and gurgle now and then; although thank God that I can give 'em back to mum if they should scream and howl, or stink and do what babies do. To live a life of dreadful luck from careless thrill, nine months of getting fat, and growing fright of things gone wrong, then hospital who fill you up with drugs and that's if things go right.
I wouldn't have the chance of looking good for months, then there's the bites and nipple strife, a smelly child, a screaming stink, that could not do the simplest thing, and grief for life.
A soul that's caged, there's no way that's for me, I don't want such responsibility.*

Awoken by the morning light, “coffee, where's coffee?

Oh God,
instant sawdust”,
and long life thumb-pot milk as sharp as dreaming someone else's memories.

Fog,
the weatherman gloats
to stop the country's rush, and ice, the weatherman adds:
a threat.

Having no urgency,
and it's too early for kitchen staff,
the visitor wanders,
opening doors,
finding reflections
in the dance hall

*His catching eyes attract as fire in hearth, alighting on myself a burning lust;
the pub, the people, places, all of Earth, vanish. I smile. He smiles. My eyes, in trust, down-turning, blur. I know his psyche hums, his eyes are bright with life itself. This dare I'll take, and him as well: he walks, he comes to me. And I, I wait for him; to where we meet and find that private space. His hand, I shall entice to want, a need to touch, adore my female style. We talk a grand unworded stream of wish. In need, as much in me, I find I dance and flaunt my curves, and taunt myself as all his life deserves.*

Eaten, filled,
the visitor,
he walks the town,
and finds

architectural finesse subjugated by I'm here me-too shout-out signs, by redbrick and rotting frame, by rude commercial of the crude.

Yet the town's nature survives above the abject word of merchant promise, in patterned brick, and chimney stack.

Less crass, a low line bungalow, an architecture built to say
"honest, its going to be alright", the doomed assurances of a surgery.

*The doctor said my body's going wild, the safest thing to do is to abort:
if I did that, I'd never have a child again. He told me this is what I ought to do, and so I told him where to go.
I want to take this chance of giving birth; he said he thought that's what I'd say. I know it is a risk: some mothers bleed to death because of what I've got. He said he'll keep an eye on me. It's strange: I feel I'm like the rope they strain in tugs of war—I need to have my child, I want to live a life—yet I'm relaxed. I've made my choice. I'll ride these rolling die. God knows I have to try.*

Newspaper scanned, forgotten, magazine thumbed and empty,
crossword incomplete,
the visitor drives.

And of complete control stops sharp
as a young child,
who's learnt the how but not yet the where
of running,
skelters across the road to be gathered

by her chasing,
fearing,
father.

Sweat.
No blood.

A moment crawls.

Still seated,
the visitor
hears a tyre howl,
a metallic slap,
and is kicked,

and his car
which had stop
now drifts
a helpless drift
towards the gathered child.

The father moves,
my God, they move.
Safe. They are safe.

Stillness.

And shock continues
as a young thunders out of the ego–music
lout–mobile,
abuse exploding
anger–faced
arms streaming mania.

A policeman comes,

with strength to quell a dozen tanks, with build to match, a matchstick man, the constable, a man to glare the sun back down, he comes to be control. No dreams, no doubt, the now of am, in small, in slight, in uniform, he leads the calm he is:

he,
who walks with Gods who can't exist, a man the town has never seen before, nor ever will again.

With eyes, all bow,
though none know why.

The youth: silent.
No words are said,
for now he knows,
without that shunt
he would have broken
the motherless child.

The visitor,
invaded by relief,
feels triumph
like hot water
washing his soul.

He leaves
shaken,
safe,
into the fog,
into the hills,
unseen.

Only the birds hear
the sound of the driven finger

snap mute.

Her catching eyes attract as fire in hearth, alighting on myself a burning lust;
the pub, the people, places, all of Earth, vanish. She smiles. I smile. Her eyes, of trust, down–turning, shine. Her face, her features, glow like understanding God exists. This dare I'll take, and she as well: I rise and go to her. And she, she waits for me; to where we meet and find that private space. My hand, it has a need, without command, to touch, caress her female style. We talk a grand unworded stream of wish. Of heat, and much in guile, she moves her dancing female curves, and taunts herself as all that life deserves.

My lust, a violating fire of force, can burn from silent calm in dark forlorn to whims of torment striking out. A course to deepest guilt, perhaps, but I was born this way, and love this way, I must. That rare courageous one, I seek, a phoenix from the gulls, who gains her smaller death in fear and suffered flames: we'll share our burning wrong.
But here, with catching eyes, I fear my lust unchecked could cause a grievous hurt; a bird of fire is rare indeed. Alight, I must infer her beaten path. I'll risk her spurred to disappointed euphemistic hate; its worse to curse a gull the phoenix fate.

So evolution's gift to me is like mass market beer, unsubtle tasteless flow of fizz to rue the morning after, spiked with dreadful chemistry to lay me low for years. Well, balls to that, I'll go without, it isn't worth the grief. There's better things to do with life, of that I have no doubt:
create with deep technologies, or swing a nifty business deal, reflect it all in art, explore the world around us, look to God's creation, see that life is small and weak, relax alone and read a book.
A shallow life, a loneliness, the head the only thing. The empty heart is dead.

For Matt Bright

This is how it was:

work
exhaustion,

leaving
my brain
strained

like a cup of stewed tea,

and I'm sitting amongst friends and Bright words dazzle wit around me:
and I can see shock ideas sparking from mind to mind, and I can see the air bright as each temple burns,

as I fight to raise
my words beyond
the dull.

Its like trying to make espresso

using dust.

That was me, tonight:
dull, someone kept saying.
She was right.
